

FOREWORD

WITH the American flag carried by our soldiers on European soil, for the first time in history, the spirit of patriotism glows in every American heart.

It was with the purpose of creating a suitable token to commemorate the loyal, courageous part which the members of the Seventh Regiment are taking in the world war that this volume has been produced, and is offered to the officers and enlisted men of the Seventh Regiment with the best wishes of their relatives, friends and prominent business men of New York.

Copies of this commemoration volume are being given to all of the members of the Seventh Regiment as it existed when mustered into the United States Service. Copies will also be given for the military records of the State of New York, the Federal Government, and be furnished the military departments of our allies.

The personal interest in this volume is intensified by the portraits of all of the officers and men of America's most renowned military organization who are now serving with the colors.

To the fathers, mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, brothers and sweethearts of the members of the loyal Seventh this book is gratefully tendered. May our boys write another page of glorious American history in their battles in France, and return safe to their native America!

Historical Sketch of the Seventh Regiment, National Guard of New York

BRITAIN, in 1806, was claiming the right to search American vessels and take British seamen therefrom, and this claim was straining the peaceful relations between the two countries; and the killing of a seafaring New Yorker by the guns of a British war-vessel off Sandy Hook, lying-in-wait to search incoming vessels, intensified the excitement and incited the recruiting of old and creation of new military organizations. Four independent infantry companies were organized and began to drill.

The State Militia of those days was composed of so-called artillery regiments containing eight companies, each having two battalions, one composed of four companies of artillery, and the other of four companies of infantry, and in 1811, when war seemed more imminent than ever, the four companies of 1806 joined the Third Artillery as its infantry battalion. As such it was mustered into United States service for three months in 1812, and again in 1814.

In 1824 these four companies were planning to become a separate unit, but were still of the Third Artillery when, upon the historic visit of General LaFayette and his son, George Washington LaFayette, to this country, they marched in review before the distinguished visitor at the Battery, and afterward acted as escort of honor to the visiting party from the Battery to the City Hall, on Monday, August 16, 1824.

Nine days later the four companies met at the Shakespeare Tavern at Fulton and Nassau Streets and resolved to ask the Governor to separate them from their artillery connection and organize them as a separate unit under the name of National Guard, a name chosen, it is said, in honor of LaFayette who was general of the Garde Nationale, of Paris. Governor Clinton complied, and made it a battalion under the name National Guard.

The captains were: First Company, Irad Hawley; Second Company, John Telfair; Third Company, William B. Curtis; Fourth Company, Howard M. Simon. Oliver M. Lownds, a very prominent citizen, asked permission to raise the Fifth Company, which he did, turning it over to the Battalion as a Christmas present in 1824, and Linus W. Stevens, who had been one of the artillery captains, raised the Sixth Company, which joined the Battalion December 27.

Governor Clinton in separating the National Guard from the Third Artillery, ordered it to be consolidated with the Second Regiment. This proposition was very unpopular, and as the result of a vigorous protest the Governor undid that knot, making it a separate unit. As such it was entitled to select a lieutenant colonel, for which office it chose Prosper M. Wetmore, and a major, for which it named Captain Linus W. Stevens for promotion, on October 18, 1825. In the same month a Seventh Company came in with Captain Van Buren at its head, and Andrew Warner, who was lieutenant of the Seventh Company, raised a company of his own—the Eighth, which he turned over, complete on May 4, 1826.

This made it a full regiment, and Governor Clinton on May 6, ordered it to be organized as the "Twenty-seventh Regiment of Artillery." On May 23, 1826, Prosper M. Wetmore was elected Colonel; Linus W. Stevens, Lieutenant-Colonel, and John Telfair, Major. On May 31 the Regiment paraded, and received "an elegant stand of colors" from Mayor Philip Hone at Castle Garden, in presence of Governor DeWitt Clinton and the division officers. From Castle Garden the Regiment marched to the Washington Parade Ground where the city corporation had provided a bountiful feast of which leading items were "two oxen, roasted whole, two hundred hams, and innumerable barrels of beer."

Colonel Wetmore resigned in 1827; his successor, Colonel Linus W. Stevens, resigned in July, 1828, and Lieutenant-Colonel Manning succeeded as Colonel but resigned in September. There was a unanimous election of ex-Colonel Stevens, who declined and Lieutenant-Colonel Levi Hunt was selected for Colonel. He also resigned, and after much persuading Linus W. Stevens agreed to become Colonel again.

The Regiment paraded November 26, 1830 in honor of the French Revolution of that year which elevated Louis Phillippe of Orleans ("Egalité") to be Citizen-King. The first encampment of the Regiment occurred July 2 to 5, 1831.

In the turbulent politics of the time Jackson's veto of the United States Bank Charter had fanned the excitement to white heat, and the contest of 1834, between Cornelius Van Wyck, Tammany, for Mayor, and Gulian C. Verplanck, candidate of the Whigs and independent Democrats, was very bitter. In the November election "Jackson" Democrats destroyed the ballots in a raid on the Sixth Ward polls, and the resulting riot proving too heavy for the civil authorities called out the Twenty-seventh Regiment to quell it, which it readily did, though it also patrolled the streets that night to guard against further outbreak. This was the first of the many riot-breaking victories of the Regiment.

The next riot call was for much more strenuous work in July, when mobs broke up abolition meetings addressed by William Lloyd Garrison and sacked the churches of Drs. Ludlow and Cox, in Spring Street. Barricaded at Spring and Sullivan Streets the rioters wounded many of the soldiers with stones and other missiles but were soon dispersed by clever maneuvers which split the rioters into sections.

Colonel Stevens resigning in December, 1834, was succeeded by Morgan L. Smith, who had been Lieutenant-Colonel. He resigned in the summer of 1837, was succeeded by Colonel John M. Catlin until 1839; he by Colonel Jones until April, 1844, when W. R. Vermilye succeeded until he resigned, and Andrew A. Bremner was elected Colonel in November, 1845. In each case these officers were lieutenant-colonels when elected to the colonelcy. Under Col. Bremner's administration, on July 27, 1847, Governor Young ordered the title of the Regiment to be changed from "Twenty-seventh Artillery" to "Seventh Regiment, New York State Militia." Colonel Bremner gave the Regiment able and constructive command until October, 1848, when he resigned his commission and was succeeded by Lieutenant-Colonel Duryee in January, 1849.

The Astor Place riot occurred in May. It arose out of the enmity between the tragedians Edwin Forrest, American, and William C. Macready, English, and their partisans, each claiming that the other had instigated unfair criticism and treatment of the other. Macready had played a very successful engagement in New York in 1848, but when he made a return engagement a cabal was organized which saluted him with catcalls, hisses and noises that made him inaudible through the act, and Mrs. Pope, playing Lady Macbeth, was greeted with such abuse and vulgarity that she fled the stage. Macready's next entrance brought a fusilade of stale eggs and heavy missiles. The curtain was rung down and the audience dismissed, the mob howling in triumph. Though Macready offered to cancel the engagement, forty leading citizens, feeling that the city was disgraced by the acts they had witnessed, urgently appealed to him, in writing, to give another performance, promising full protection. Advertisements naming Friday, May 10, for the performance were posted, and alongside of them were others announcing Edwin Forrest, on the same date in the same play, at Wallack's Broadway Theatre. Threatening handbills denouncing Macready were distributed.

Though tickets were sold only to those supposed to be friendly to Macready, disturbers gained admittance and rushed to the stage in the endeavor to seize Macready. They were stopped by the police, who held the leaders and ejected the others. The police were roughly handled by the mob outside when the Seventh Regiment, under Colonel Duryee, preceded by a troop of horse, appeared. The horsemen, attacked by the mob with a shower of missiles were compelled to retreat on Third Avenue, leaving several wounded. The Seventh Regiment then in column of platoons cleared a way to Third Avenue; thence in column of companies cleared Eighth Street, and finally, again moving through Broadway into Astor Place formed a line in front of the theatre, and there were assaulted by volleys of stones, wounding several soldiers. The men kept cool and were ordered to load with ball cartridge. Recorder Tallmage, representing the city, begged the mob to retire, but they did not heed. Sheriff Westervelt after consulting General Charles W. Sandford, division commander, ordered a volley to be fired, but to aim at the dead wall opposite, above the heads of the crowd. The soldiers obeyed, but the crowd jeered and threw more missiles. Then, obeying orders, the soldiers, aiming low, fired with deadly effect and, pressing hard on the flying mob soon cleared Astor Place. The leaders rallied in Lafayette Place and Eighth Street, but a third volley scattered them and ended the riot. The Seventh was on duty for three days, but no more disturbance occurred. About twenty rioters were killed or mortally wounded, and sixty seriously wounded; and one hundred and fifty officers and men were seriously injured, but all recovered.

The city in 1839 had granted the rooms over Centre Market for drilling purposes, and in December, 1854 the board of officers began the movement which resulted in securing the Tompkins Market Armory for the Regiment.

On June 10, 1857, the Regiment was to leave for Boston as invited participants in the Bunker Hill Monument Celebration. New York was then in a turmoil over an amended charter passed by the Legislature and especially over a provision creating a Metropolitan Police Board, composed of five members appointed by the Governor and the mayors of New York and Brooklyn, and abolishing the old police system and substituting a Metropolitan Police for it. Mayor Fernando Wood, declaring the Act unconstitutional, summoned the old municipal police to support him in holding the property of the Police Department against the new Commission and its appointees. Daniel D. Conover, appointed under a provision of the Act, by Governor John Alsop King, to the office of Street Commissioner to fill a vacancy, went to the City Hall to claim the office, and was summarily ejected by the mayor. Conover secured two warrants against the mayor, one for inciting to riot and the other for personal assault and went with a force of fifty of the new Metropolitan Police to the City Hall to serve them. The mayor's police, aided and abetted by a mob of ruffians, attacked the Metropolitan Police and would have overcome them but just then the Seventh Regiment marching down Broadway en route for the Boston steamer was halted at the City Hall. General Sandford notified Mayor Wood that if he did not submit to peaceable service of the writs he would use force. The mayor submitted, and the Regiment went on to Boston where the admiration at its appearance and drill was unbounded.

Meanwhile nine other city regiments were kept under arms in New York. The Court of Appeals promptly decided the case against Mayor Wood and the Police Commissioner proceeded to install the Metropolitan Police in place of the Municipal Police. Riots broke out in many places in the city and there was a murderous fight between two gangs of rowdies, the "Dead Rabbits" of Five Points and the "Bowery Boys" in which many bystanders as well as participants were hurt. Rioting became more widespread, mobs erecting barricades at many points. The police and militia were hard put to it in the endeavor to suppress the rioters and the Seventh was summoned from Boston by telegraph. When it arrived a new disturbance was in action at Anthony and Centre Streets, but the sight of the gray coats was a sufficient solvent for the mob which melted away. The militia remained under arms for several days, but the new police had found its bearings, and handled promptly such sporadic outbreaks as appeared.

The Regiment, in July, 1858, was selected to escort the remains of President Monroe from New York to Richmond. There, as everywhere, the Regiment was hailed with many eulogies of which this, by Colonel August, who welcomed it to Virginia, is typical: "The fame of your gallant corps is coextensive with the broad limits of this Union, and the name of National Guard is the synonym of model citizen soldier."

The famous association of the exempt members of the Seventh Regiment was organized May 9, 1859, as "Veterans of the National Guard," and was afterward incorporated. The organization, now known as Seventh Regiment Veterans, has been an honored auxiliary ever since, maintaining past and present members in bonds of perpetual fellowship, preserving the history and fame of the Seventh, and maintaining a fund for useful and benevolent purposes.

Colonel Duryee resigned his commission in July, 1859, after twenty-one years' service in the Regiment and ten years of brilliant administration as colonel. In August, 1859, Lieutenant-Colonel Marshall Lefferts was chosen to succeed him.

When the Clark Mills equestrian statue of Washington was unveiled at the National Capitol in 1860, the presence of the Seventh Regiment was requested by Congress, and after the ceremony President Buchanan made an eloquent speech of thanks to the Regiment eulogizing its effective drill and soldierly bearing. Following this address the corporation of Washington voted to the Regiment the most elegant and costly stand of colors it had received, which was presented to the Regiment by the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia in an eloquent address on September 5, 1860.

A resolution was passed privately on January 14, 1861, by the Board of Officers, for the commandant to express to the Governor of the State the desire of the Regiment to perform such duty as he might prescribe, and it was at once communicated to Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott.

On Saturday, April 13, Sumter was fired upon. On Monday, April 15, the President called for 75,000 militia. On the 16th Colonel Lefferts put the Regiment at the disposal of Governor Morgan, and on the 17th, by resolution of an Officers' Meeting the Colonel notified the Major-General that the Regiment was "ready to march forthwith." A subscription raised by the Chamber of Commerce that day netted $6,140 to equip the Regiment for active service. On April 19, the Seventh marched away, 991 strong, a most inspiring and magnificent demonstration greeting them as they marched by Union Square.

Upon reaching Philadelphia news came of riots in Baltimore, the usual means of communication between Washington and Philadelphia being destroyed. A steamer was therefore chartered, supplies laid in and the Regiment carried to Annapolis, and thence marching to Washington, where the Regiment was greeted with unfeigned joy. Washington was then a beleaguered city. Enemy bands were in the road between the capital and its friends, tearing up tracks and cutting telegraph wires. The officials and people at Washington did not know of the popular uprising in the North, and therefore the arrival of the Seventh as the avant-courier of Union strength inspired the loyal with joy and hope, and the whole city with a sense of safety.

The members of the Regiment were quartered in the Hall of Representatives, the Colonel occupied the Speaker's room, and field and staff officers had excellent quarters in committee rooms.

On April 26 the Regiment was sworn into United States service for thirty days, and on April 27 the Regiment was reinforced by a detachment under Captain Egbert L. Viele, the members of which were men who from sickness, absence from New York, or other cause, had not marched from New York, as well as recruits for the several companies. They came in the steamer "Daylight," direct from New York, which also brought needed supplies for the Regiment. The camp equipage having all arrived a camp was prepared by the Ninth and Tenth Companies, and pitched on Meridian Hill, two miles from the Capital. It was named Camp Cameron, in honor of Simon Cameron, then Secretary of War, and was the first camp to be pitched in front of the enemy during the Civil War. The first death in the casualty list was that of J. Lawrence Keese, private in the Eighth Company, who on May 9, 1861, was instantly killed by the accidental discharge of a musket. He was a Brooklynite and popular in his company. A detail of his comrades accompanied the body to Brooklyn, where a great throng gathered at Christ Church to pay their last tribute of respect.

The question was much discussed as to what the Regiment would do when its thirty-day enlistment expired. But it was finally decided to return to New York at the close of the term of enlistment and let every man determine for himself what to do for the country. The organization as a whole would answer emergency calls for service outside the city, and would continue the organization for the protection of New York against internal turbulence or outside invasion, should any occur. Commanders of volunteer regiments all over the country looked to the Seventh Regiment for officer material, and a considerable number received commissions in the regular establishment and some in the Navy.

The total number of members of the Seventh Regiment who served as officers in the Regular and Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States was one hundred and six, distributed among the ten companies as follows: A, 43; B, 80; C, 57; D, 42; E, 54; F, 97; G, 64; H, 65; I, 42; K, 62. There were fifty-eight members of the Seventh Regiment who were killed or died of wounds or disease in the United States service during the Civil War, of whom fifty-two were of commissioned rank, three were sergeants, and three were privates. These statistics show to what extent the training received in the Seventh Regiment was availed of to supply officers to the Union Army.

On Monday, June 3, 1861, forty-five days after its march of April 19, the Regiment was mustered out of the United States service. It had been welcomed back with plaudits and the Board of Councilmen on the evening of the muster out day, unanimously passed resolutions commending the Regiment for its prompt and valuable service to the nation. Less than ten days later seventy members of the Regiment had accepted commissions in the United States service.

Colonel Lefferts on behalf of the Regiment had notified Secretary Stanton of the readiness of the Seventh to respond to any emergency call. The time came for action under that offer in the early summer, when the Army of the Potomac under McClellan was in the Peninsula formed by the James and York Rivers, facing toward Richmond, but inactive, McDowell was in Upper Virginia to protect Washington, while Banks, with a small force which had wintered at Frederick, Md., advanced down the Valley of the Shenandoah, while McDowell shifted his force to the line of the Rappahannock. Stonewall

Jackson, who had been on McClellan's front, stole quickly around into the Shenandoah Valley, menacing Banks with a force so overpowering that he made a hasty retreat into Maryland. On May 24, 1862, when Banks was retreating from Strasburg, the following telegram to Governor Morgan was repeated to the Seventh Regiment the same date:

"The operations of the enemy on the Shenandoah may require speedy reinforcements. Please organize one regiment as speedily as possible. The Seventh, New York, should also be in readiness to move, if called for."

General Banks having been driven to the Potomac, President Lincoln telegraphed to Governor Morgan to forward the militia of the City of New York to aid in checking the enemy and defending Washington. The next evening, May 26, the Seventh marched through a cheering crowd that packed Broadway, boarded a steamer at 9 p. m. for Elizabeth where the Regiment entrained. The troops had expected to go direct to Washington, but arrived at 5 p. m. at Baltimore, where they received orders to remain for the present, as Jackson had retreated up the Shenandoah Valley and Washington was safe. On May 28th the Regiment went into camp at Stewart's Grove. The Regiment was mustered in for three months' service, dating from May 25th, and was moved from Stewart's Grove to Fort Federal Hill. The men were disappointed. They had hoped to be sent to Harper's Ferry or some other place near the active front. But Federal Hill was an important point dominating the defenses of and approaches to Baltimore, and a good strategic point for quick transit to any menaced point in that region, should an emergency arise. But no emergency came. "All was quiet on the Potomac" for the entire period of their occupancy and they lived a garrison life for three months, arrived in New York on August 29th, and were mustered out of the United States service on September 5th, after a term of one hundred and two days.

A new militia law was passed in 1862 which was intended to enlarge and improve the militia of the State. There was one provision in the law which the Seventh Regiment men would have been more than satisfied to see omitted, and that was the provision to give to the entire uniformed militia the name and title of the "National Guard of the State of New York." The Seventh had enjoyed the name of National Guard exclusively and had made it a title of peculiar distinction, which lost its significance when applied to the militia as a whole.

In the summer of 1863 the North was menaced by the strategy and bold initiative of General Robert E. Lee. More troops were needed to meet the invasion that the Southern leader was planning. The Seventh received an emergency call and was dispatched to Harrisburg, Pa., on June 17, 1863, but at Philadelphia the orders were changed and the Regiment was again taken to Fort Federal Hill. There was much dissatisfaction at this assignment, but the stay was not so monotonous as in the previous year. Special duties and details gave occupation to the troops, such as guarding prisoners, who became very numerous after the Battle of Gettysburg. The guard at Fort Henry, in Baltimore, was insufficient for the purpose, and many men from Fort Federal Hill were sent to aid in that work. The Second Company, which was detailed to the work on July 3, had to mount guard over more than a thousand prisoners.

News came on Sunday, July 5, of the outcome of the Battle of Gettysburg in favor of the Union forces. The Confederates were fleeing into Virginia, and Washington and Baltimore were safe. Orders came for the Seventh to proceed to Frederick City, Maryland. On July 6 the Regiment moved by cars to Monocacy, where the troops were ordered to bivouac for the night, and on July 7, marched from Monocacy to Frederick City. There they camped on wet ground (which caused them to name it Camp Misery), and while there saw the Army of the Potomac pass by, triumphant, from Gettysburg.

On July 14 came disturbing news. The Confederates had safely crossed the Potomac, and a riot had broken out in New York City, to subdue which the Regiment was ordered home. It was intimated that the railway was disabled near Newark and the troops, therefore, went from Philadelphia by rail to Amboy and thence by boat to New York, landing at Canal Street at dawn of the 16th. The riot had raged for three days and nights. Beginning with the wrecking of the enrollment office on Third Avenue under the draft, the mob had burned that building and the entire block, had closed factories, looted stores, hanged negroes, men, women and even children to Third Avenue lamp-posts, had destroyed the Colored Orphan Asylum on Fifth Avenue from Forty-third to Forty-fourth Street (from which the hundreds of children had, fortunately, been rescued); and burned the block on the east side of Broadway from Twenty-eighth to Twenty-ninth Street. It had attacked the Tribune Building in Printing House Square, breaking all the windows and destroying furniture before being repulsed; had attacked Mulberry Street police station but had been driven away by clever police manoeuvring; and had killed Colonel H. T. O'Brien, who was on recruit duty in New York, then absent from his regiment, the Eleventh New York Volunteers. The police, who had done brave and well-directed work against overwhelming numbers, were aided the first day by a few invalid soldiers and after that by small detachments of regulars and some volunteers on their way returning home or going to the front. The members of the Seventh Regiment who had remained in New York during the Maryland campaign, or were on furlough, together with some exempt members, had done valuable service during the riots. On Monday and Tuesday they were under arms at the Armory, Major Nevers commanding, and ably assisted by Captains Riblet and Ely. On Tuesday night a detachment of seventy men, commanded by Captain Ely, marched to Webb's shipyard to protect the ironclad vessel Dunderberg, then building for the United States Government. Work had been suspended on this vessel because of the menaces of the mob, and its destruction was threatened. The guard from the Seventh was under arms for several nights and was reinforced by a detachment from the Twenty-second Regiment and a howitzer section from the Navy Yard.

During the forenoon of Thursday the Seventh remained in its Armory, awaiting orders. These, when they came, assigned to the regiment, the district from Seventh to Sixty-fifth Street and from Third Avenue to the River. Word coming that the mob was engaged in acts of violence in Second Avenue near Twenty-first Street, the Second and Third Companies, under Captain Clark, were sent there. As they marched up Second Avenue the rioters fled from the street into the adjacent buildings and when the column was near Twenty-second Street it was assaulted by discharges of musketry from doors, windows and house-tops, and from behind piles of brick and lumber. A regular skirmish followed. As soon as a rioter emerged from hiding or peeped from behind his barricade to discharge musket or pistol, he was greeted with a dozen bullets. This skirmishing continued from Twenty-second to Thirty-third Street, dislodging every rioter and silencing every gun. The soldiers behaved with coolness and bravery and, fortunately, none was seriously injured. Private Davis received a buckshot wound in the hand and the clothing of several men was torn by bullets. The rioters' weapons and ammunition were imperfect and their aim poor. Two rioters were known to have been killed and numbers wounded. The Eighth Company, detailed to carry a wounded policeman to Bellevue Hospital, was attacked by concealed rioters, but in the skirmish that followed only the rioters suffered. Detachments of the men for guard duty at various points were fired on during the night, the fire being promptly returned, though the darkness concealed the effects. The Regiment returned to the armory on Friday, July 17, and remained under arms, without intermission, until July 25, when part of the Regiment was dismissed, and during the week the force was reduced to a single company. The draft, suspended on account of the riot, was resumed about August 20, when the whole Regiment was on duty for several days; but the conscription was completed without molestation.

On March 9, 1863, Colonel Lefferts officially announced, in a farewell address to the Regiment, that he had resigned his commission, but with the resignation, General Hall forwarded to Governor Seymour a memorial, addressed to Colonel Lefferts, signed by nearly all the rank and file of the Regiment, urging the withdrawal of the resignation. This memorial supported by a request from the Governor induced the Colonel to continue in command. On August 1, 1863, Colonel Lefferts again resigned his commission, but his resignation was not accepted, and he was granted leave of absence for two months. In September he was appointed to be brigadier-general to command a new brigade of which the Seventh was to be the nucleus, but he did not accept this appointment and resumed command of the Regiment in October. In June, 1864, he resigned his commission, and the resignation was accepted. In 1876, on the 3rd of July, he left New York with the Veterans of the Seventh Regiment to attend the Centennial of American Independence at Philadelphia, but died suddenly, of heart disease, in the presence of old and loved comrades, on the train between Jersey City and Newark.

On June 21, 1864, Captain Emmons Clark, of the Second Company, was elected Colonel. It was a time when the prospects of the Regiment were not bright. Old and experienced officers had resigned to accept office in the Volunteer and Regular services until only Captain Riblet, of the Fourth Company, remained of the company commandants who served with distinction before the war and who marched with the Regiment to the defence of Washington in 1861.

Guard duty was kept up in the Fall of 1864, for the draft was proceeding and the authorities were taking no chances of the resumption of rioting. But the re-election of President Lincoln and the popular support of the war which that implied brought public confidence, and soon after the guard at the armory was finally relieved.

The Regiment, during the war, and particularly in its last year was frequently called upon to parade as funeral escort of distinguished officers who were killed in the war. On December 31, 1864, the Seventh was selected for like office at the funeral of Hon. William L. Dayton, United States minister to France and distinguished statesman. The Regiment on Washington's Birthday, February 22, paraded to celebrate the success of General Sherman and his Army, and the capture of Charleston.

When the body of President Lincoln, on its itinerary from Washington to its last resting place at Springfield, Ill., was brought to New York, the distinguished honor of receiving it was awarded to the Seventh Regiment, which met the hearse at the foot of Desbrosses Street, acted as guard of honor in the procession to the City Hall, and did guard duty from the time of its arrival through the night and until the cortege was ready to leave for Albany. During all this time, night included, the body lay in state at City Hall and was viewed by a procession that reverently passed through the hall without intermission. The Regiment marched with the procession from the City Hall to the Hudson River Railroad Station in Thirtieth Street.

During the latter half of 1865 the Seventh took part in entertaining returning regiments and honoring returning heroes, including General Grant, who was serenaded by the Regiment upon his first visit to the city after the close of the war, and General Sherman, to whom and staff the officers of the Seventh gave a dinner at Delmonico's. On January 31, 1866, the Regiment gave a grand reception to its members who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the Civil War, using the Academy of Music for the reception and dance and Irving Hall for the supper room, the two buildings being connected by a building erected in Irving Place and extending from entrance to entrance.

The Regiment paraded with the First Division in review before President Andrew Johnson when the President was officially received in the city on August 29, 1866; and the Regiment paraded to inaugurate the new Parade Ground in Tompkins' Square, being reviewed there by Mayor Hoffman, on September 1. In 1867 the Commissioners of Central Park granted a site for a memorial of the services of the Seventh Regiment and its members during the Civil War, and the commission for the statue of a private soldier of the Seventh Regiment was entrusted to J. Q. A. Ward, the distinguished sculptor.

During several years following the record of the Regiment was that of routine work, new improvements in drill and especially in rifle practice and parades and receptions to keep up the reputation of the Regiment. On invitation the Seventh visited the City of Norwich, Conn., on July 9, 1868; Albany, Troy, and Saratoga Springs in July, 1889, and Philadelphia in July, 1870, each of these excursions, with the attendant parades and entertainments, being brilliantly successful, a notable feature of the Philadelphia reception being the speech of Major-General George C. Meade in eulogy of volunteer soldiery in general and the Seventh Regiment in particular.

In 1870 an Orangemen's picnic was held at Elm Park on Eighth Avenue, near Ninety-second Street, on July 12, anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne. The band was playing "Boyne Water" when it happened to pass a gang of laborers—Irish Catholics—working on a boulevard near by. The laborers attacked the Orangemen with stones and the Orangemen resisted. Shots were fired on both sides, and three persons were killed on the spot and others mortally wounded. The police restored order at the time, but the partisans on both sides remembered it. The Orangemen determined to vindicate their right to parade on the next Boyne anniversary, but their opponents, the Ribbonmen, were determined they should not, and made preparations to oppose the parade by force. There were so many associations for this purpose that the police were alarmed at the danger which threatened the public peace. Neither opposition nor persuasion, however, availed to make the Orangemen relinquish their right to parade, and on Monday, July 10, 1871, the mayor called upon the military to aid the civil authorities in preserving order, and the Seventh, Ninth and Twenty-second Regiments and the Washington Grays were designated for that duty. James J. Kelso, superintendent of police, later in that day issued an order prohibiting the parade. This order created widespread public indignation and unanimous condemnation by the press. Governor Hoffman came in hot haste from Albany, and the morning papers of July 12 contained his proclamation revoking the order of the superintendent of police, and pledging protection to the Orange procession. Most of the Orange lodges when the police order had been issued had arranged to spend the anniversary outside of the city, so that less than one hundred in all appeared to parade. The Seventh Regiment, at 1.30 P. M., received orders from headquarters to report to General Varian at Eighth Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, for service in protecting the procession of Orangemen. At about 3 P. M. the procession was formed, five companies of the Seventh Regiment ahead, followed by the Orangemen, flanked on the right by the Twenty-second in columns of fours, and on the left by the Eighty-fourth and in the rear the Sixth and Ninth Regiments in columns of companies. The right wing of the Seventh Regiment was formed in line upon the sidewalk on the west side of Eighth Avenue. Some members of this line, under orders, fired a few shots at men who appeared at the windows or on the housetops opposite, with arms and missiles and assaulted the procession as it passed down the avenue. At Twenty-fourth Street shots and missiles from sidewalks and roofs were answered by fatal volleys from the Eighty-fourth and Ninth Regiments, followed by shots from the Sixth Regiment. The rest of the procession, which ended at the Seventh's Armory (where the Orangemen, one by one, availed themselves of the opportunity to escape to their homes uninjured), while it witnessed many manifestations of the mob-spirit, was without serious difficulty. Detective police, accompanying the procession, disarmed and arrested all who made hostile demonstrations. The number of killed and mortally wounded was fifty-four, including three members of the Ninth Regiment.

Exposures of the Tweed Ring made the election of 1871 in November a desperately contested one. As a precaution the Seventh, Twelfth, Twenty-second and Seventy-first Regiments were ordered to their armories, where they were from 6 A. M. until late at night. But their services were not needed, and the Reform party won a brilliant and peaceful victory. The Seventh Regiment led the special escort column on November 21, 1871, at the reception and parade meeting and escorting the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia upon his landing at Pier 1, North River, to the Clarendon Hotel at Fourth Avenue and Eighteenth Street.

As nine years had elapsed since the Seventh had been in camp, and only seventy-five of its members had had that experience, an encampment was held at Saratoga Springs from July 3 to 9. This first camp after the Civil War was the forerunner of many other successful ones.

The Corps of Cadets of the United States Military Academy, which under command of General Upton had attended the second inauguration of General Grant at Washington, paraded from the Battery Place to the Seventh Regiment Armory and thence after two hours of rest and refreshment to the Grand Central Depot, on March 6, 1873. The Seventh Regiment acted on these marches as the escort of the Cadets. The famous marching of the Cadets was greatly applauded, yet the unprofessional soldiers of the Seventh, in the partial eyes of New Yorkers, did not suffer by comparison.

The first visit of the Seventh Regiment to Creedmoor, on September 18, 1873, inaugurated the continuous and scientific cultivation of the shooting art which has ever since been a characteristic of the Seventh Regiment training. Each year since has had its reviews, its trainings and its rifle practices, particular mention of which is not possible in this brief account.

The Seventh Regiment Memorial Statue with its base, was finally completed in 1874 and was unveiled in Central Park on June 22, 1874, with appropriate and imposing ceremonies. The semi-centennial of the organization of the Regiment was celebrated October 6, 1874 by a parade in the day and a dinner at Irving Hall in the evening. The visit of the Regiment to Boston June 16 to 18, 1875, connected with the Centennial of the Battle of Bunker Hill, was long remembered with great satisfaction by its participants.

The Board of Aldermen of New York passed a resolution July 1, 1875, designating the plot of ground bounded by Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Streets and Park and Lexington Avenues, and appropriated $350,000 for its erection, and this resolution was approved by Mayor Wickham, but the Board of Estimate and Apportionment by an evenly divided vote failed to set aside the money. Litigation followed and dragged and on January 15, 1876 the Board of Officers decided not to further urge the building of the Armory at public expense, and to try to raise sufficient funds by subscription from active and veteran members and their friends, citizens of New York. The subscription was very liberal, the cornerstone of the present magnificent armory was laid October 13, 1877, and it was occupied April 1, 1880.

The encampment of 1876 was on George's Hill in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, July 1 to 4. The inauguration of the Lafayette Statue at Union Square, September 6, the celebration of the Centennial of the Battle of Harlem Heights, September 16, and the review by Governor Tilden, October 3, were prominent events in which the Regiment participated in 1876.

As a consequence of numerous riots throughout the country the Regiment, in common with the other militia organizations was under arms at its armory from July 24 to 27, 1877, but no disturbance occurred in New York requiring military intervention. That year and the following one were a period of activity in the raising of funds for the new Armory.

In order to gather the funds needed for the Armory Fund many enterprises were set on foot, and the enterprise took such a hold on the enthusiasm of the members as to greatly encourage recruiting and other interests. A great fair was undertaken and carried to success and the entry of the Regiment into the new armory in April, 1880 was a notable occasion, when the Regiment was escorted thither by the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-first Regiments commanded by General Varian, of the Third Brigade, and the Armory Inauguration Ball was a brilliant social success.

Among the important events were the camps at Peekskill, trips to Buffalo and Hartford; to Washington in April, 1886, the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Regiment's march to the relief of the Capital; at Inaugural ceremonies, to Albany and Washington; the Grant funeral escort, and various other reviews and escorts, among them to Count de Rochambeau and other French delegates; Boston Cadets, 1881; Twenty-second Regiment, 1882; Brooklyn Bridge opening, 1883, the Bartholdi Statue, 1886, and the rifle matches.

Colonel Emmons Clark, whose devotion to the Regiment was untiring, and whose success in its behalf was monumental, resigned from further service in 1889, and Colonel Daniel Appleton succeeded him in an administration equally devoted and fruitful.

The service of the Regiment in the last decade of the Nineteenth Century included that in the Brooklyn Car Riot in 1895, the Croton Dam Riot covering varied conditions of service and duty with operations expanded over twenty square miles, in 1900.

The War with Spain came in 1898 and the Regiment made ample preparation to participate in it but found it impossible, under the regulations imposed to go as an organization without losing its identity and impairing its morale and usefulness, so that it did not go as an organization, though its members were free to and many did, participate in the conflict with other units.

Ever since its first participation in the rifle shooting at Creedmoor the Seventh Regiment has held a leading place in the Rifle showing records, the Army and Navy Journal Cup becoming its property on its third victory in 1883. The work of the Riflemen has become a marked feature in the training of the Seventh Regiment soldier; and in the armory and at the range at Blauvelt the men of the Regiment have had the amplest opportunity to win marksman, sharp-shooter and expert medals; and the biennial tour of camp duty at Peekskill has also been a valuable training.

In the Dewey Parade of 1899, which was in length and completeness the record of the last century, the part taken by the Seventh Regiment was commented upon as representing the highest attainment of soldierly bearing and marching efficiency. There was a Centennial Celebration of the Regiment in 1906.

Physical efficiency has been promoted by the work of the Athletic Association; and the exhibition games, twice yearly, draw large gatherings of spectators and include interesting events for the winning of which cups and trophies are awarded. Many times the soldiers of the Seventh and the cadets of the Military Academy at West Point have fraternized in field work, and the annual contest at baseball between the West Point and Seventh Regiment on the afternoon of Memorial Day has been an interesting event strengthening the bond of these two congenial arms of the service.

The adoption of the khaki or olive drab uniform for service work was a step which accords with the idea which has taken hold of the modern school of military training that the volunteer soldier should be given the best opportunity possible to become accustomed to the actual conditions of a soldier's life and duty.

In recent years the Seventh has continued to maintain its old standard. It was a marked figure in many of the functions that went to make the Hudson-Fulton Celebration of 1909 a record of such occasions. When military organizations of many nations and states marched in line in the most magnificent military procession ever seen on this continent, all the critics at home and elsewhere put the Seventh in the first rank of those whose grace and precision of motion marked them as perfect in training.

On every occasion when the services of the Regiment was desired or required by the President, he has had its tender of service in his hand. It was so in 1807, 1808, 1812-1814, 1861 and 1898, and it has been so more recently in the work of the Regiment of five months' service under Federal rule in olive-drab at McAllen for the defense of the Texas border; and is now evident at this present date (February, 1918) when the Regiment, temporarily camouflaged under the tag of "107th" U. S. Infantry (but still "Seventh New York" in heart and spirit) is doing strenuous work at Camp Wadsworth, hardening itself for the task of going "over the top" to break Hindenburg's "iron ring." As to the details of these two last crowning efforts at service, are they not written in the chronicles of the "Rio Grande Rattler" and the "Wadsworth Gas Attack?"

While spending months at the Armory before going south in 1917 the Regiment was called to frequent service to escort the Commissioners of our Allies. The most impressive service of this kind was that of honor escort of the great and friendly Frenchman, Marshal Joffre, hero of the Marne, paralleling the event that ushered in the beginning of the Regiment as a separate entity, when the four companies were honor escort to that other great and friendly Frenchman—General LaFayette, in 1824.

Colonel Daniel Appleton's brilliant administration of the Regiment ended with his resignation in 1916, followed soon by his being commissioned as Major General in the State establishment. In Colonel Willard C. Fisk the Regiment has a commander fit to be successor to Wetmore, Stevens, Bremner, Duryee, Lefferts, Clark, Appleton, and other brilliant and forceful men who have made the Seventh Regiment famous as the finest representation of trained citizen soldiery and the premier National Guard organization in the United States.
